What emerging risks or critical trends should risk leaders not ignore in 2026?

Risk leaders must closely monitor three accelerating forces: AI-driven disruption, the compounding effects of climate change, and geopolitical fragmentation. These risks are deeply interconnected and require proactive, cross-functional collaboration. AI governance and ethical deployment will shape resilience. Climate volatility demands scenario-based planning beyond traditional risk models. And global tensions threaten supply chains and regulatory predictability. Ignoring these will jeopardize strategic agility.

How has your work evolved recently in relation to your role?

As co-founder of Risk-!n, my focus has increasingly shifted from organizing a conference to fostering a multidisciplinary platform. I now engage more with innovation leaders, regulators, and academia to bring diverse, real-time insights to our community. We're moving beyond event curation to shaping how emerging risks are discussed, understood, and acted upon. It's about connecting risk intelligence to operational agility.

From your perspective, what makes participation in Risk-!n uniquely valuable?

Risk-!n stands out because it's designed by risk professionals, for risk professionals—without commercial bias. We unite experts from multiple disciplines and geographies, offering both breadth and depth in risk thinking. The experience is highly interactive, inspiring candid discussions that go beyond frameworks to real-world challenges. It's a space where strategy meets action—and where future risk leaders find their voice.

The last question is quite personal, what's a non-work hobby or passion that surprisingly helps you in your role?

I start most mornings at the gym. It's my daily pressure release, where movement clears my mind and resets my energy. The discipline and mental clarity gained through physical training carry into how I lead and make decisions under stress. It's a simple yet powerful habit that strengthens my resilience—both physically and professionally.
